

By

John Dirks

Countless personal health and wellness applications have been developed over the past few years, and more spring up all the time. The ubiquity of devices, health-focused apps, social networks, and other digital tools all enable users to set new goals and regularly collect and track their own personal data toward achieving them.

When coupled with a good user experience, personal health apps and data can inspire positive behavioral or lifestyle changes. This article by John Dirks and fellow Blinker Tom Satwicz was published in September 2014 in UXPA Magazine.

Your Plan

Share:

Jonathan
Your quit date is Jan. 15, 2014

Edit Plan

♥ Your Inspiration

👤 Your Inner Circle

- Ross Johnson
- Hannah Wilson
- Emily Shaw
- Alexandra Filson

🎯 Your Plan

- Gradually cut back 2 cigarettes per day
- Give up the easiest cigarettes of the day
- Only smoke from 10 a.m. to 9 p.m.
- Don't smoke during certain situations
- Practice taking "smokers' holidays"

Practice your daily exercises!

🕒 Your Quit medications

Don't forget to take your nicotine gum!

🚫 Be aware of your triggers

- Places - Home, restaurants, bars
- People - Spouse/partner smoking
- Activities - Eating, drinking coffee or tea
- In my body or mind - Urges, restlessness

Figure 1. WebQuit asks users to develop a plan for quitting that includes emotional inspiration and specific targets.

Read More at UX Magazine.